Dale Ralph Davis' work in this commentary on 1 Samuel has simply been a great blessing to me. As a relatively new Christian the Old Testament has often been tough for me to get into, after reading this commentary, however, the Old Testament book of 1 Samuel has come alive to me. Davis divides this commentary into three parts: Part 1 is called a Prophet from God's Grace (Chapters 1-7), Part 2 is a King in God's Place (Chapters 8-14), and Part 3 is called a Man after God's Heart (Chapters 15-31). After reading and highlighting all over the place I decided to write on a note card what I learned after reading this work, and I want to share some of them, as they will cover some of the major themes of 1 Samuel. God's work is often quiet (1 Sam. 2). God for his people acts with judgement and mercy (1 Sam. 4). Yahweh's interesting and imaginative ways of deliverance calls forth praise from us (1 Sam. 19). Yahweh's protection is completely unknown to us often (1 Sam. 25). If you are someone who is scared of commentaries this one by Davis will not scare you. You will be able to tell by the first chapter that he does an excellent job explaining the text, illustrating the text, and applying the text for everyday life. Davis most importantly does draw out of the text the glories of Christ in a way that makes you so grateful for our great Savior. I agree with Eric Alexander, who said this on the front cover, "The best expository commentary I have read in years."

If what you are looking for is a deeply exegetical discussion of 1 Samuel, this is not the book for you. While Davis' work is based upon sound exegesis, it is more of a practical explanation of the text in ways that are easily understood and applied. No pastor who takes the Bible seriously should fail to have this book on his shelf when studying 1 Samuel. His commentary on 2 Samuel and 1 & 2 Kings are also equally as helpful.

This I found to be an enjoyable devotional Commentary on the Book of 1 Samuel. The author educate with precision, excitement and life examples. "The Theology of Grace" The Unmerited Favor, Unfailing Love, Free Gift and Enabling Power of Father God in the name of our Lord, Savior and King Jesus Christ via the Holy Ghost. -Here is a statement that I find very important to remember "grace must always be the decisive and dominating factor in the Christian's practical theology. He must confess that this success, this employment, this loved one, this health, this meal is what Yahweh has given." "What do you have that you did not receive?" (1 Cor. 4:7). Every Christian then has no choice "you must be a good theologian who both speaks and lives a theology of grace. You will find it humbling, but it is the only thing that will keep you from worshipping yourself." (pg.318-19) "Dr. Dale Ralph Davis

How good is this commentary? Let's see... I'm dispensational, but I love this reformed commentary on an Old Testament book. It's just that good!

While preparing to teach a class on 1 Samuel, I saw quite a few reviewers giving glowing recommendations to Dale Ralph Davis's commentaries on the OT historical books. Having never read anything by Dale Ralph Davis before, (or even heard of him prior to reading said reviews), I figured I would buy his work on 1 Samuel and see what all the excitement was about. The work is not a conventional scholarly commentary. Essentially, the book is a collection of sermons that has been adapted into commentary form. Davis peppers the sermons with occasional anecdotes. He obviously likes WWII history, since a quite a few of his illustrations seem to be pulled from that field.

There's also the occasional joke thrown in. He includes some thought / discussion questions at the end of each chapter for devotional contemplation. Davis' exegesis is sound, but not immensely detailed. (Space doesn't really permit that!) He has obviously read enough of the scholarly literature to comment in an informed manner. He occasionally interacts with the Hebrew, but the words are all transliterated and it should be easy for anyone without knowledge of the language to understand. He also occasionally addresses text-critical issues when they are relevant, but he doesn't allow them to overshadow the main focus of the narrative. He is not dogmatically committed to the MT (like Tsumura), but he doesn't play fast and loose with emendations either (like McCarter). For me, this commentary was filled with numerous "Aha!" moments, and instances of wondering how I did not see something that was so plainly at the forefront of the biblical text. Davis is super readable and super quotable, and turns phrases like I see few biblical commentators do. He has a knack for getting to the real point of the text, rather than creating contrived applications that don't really fit what the author says. He is far more interested in how the stories fit into the overall Biblical narrative than in simply compiling a list of good deeds and bad deeds that each respective character did. He rightly leaves readers with the impression that the book is really not about Saul or David, but rather about God. He also frequently makes Christological / Christotelic applications, which I found (for the most part) compelling. If you are looking to study Samuel, this book needs to be near the top of your list. (The fact that Longman doesn't even mention this book in his survey is baffling). I heartily recommend this book, and plan to purchase more of Davis' books in the future. As a first time reader with no prior knowledge of the author, I can objectively say that it has certainly lived up to the praise that has been given to it, and it has been a refreshing reminder to me of the kinds of exposition that first got me interested in the field of biblical studies.

Another excellent commentary from Dale Ralph Davis. I absolutely devour his books and consequently have tons of notes written all over the margins of my Bible. Great book from a great teacher--and it helps that he gets me laughing while he's teaching!

I really enjoy Davis. He is a scholar who doesn't talk like one.. He has phenomenal insight, and his expositional comments are often more like devotional in the sense that they really get to you. My only complaint is that Davis doesn't give a Big Idea for the passage. For that you'll have to come up with yourself, or get the new Teach the Text Commentary Series.
